212-221: JAMES WARD. — A rejoinder to Professor Titchener's reference to his article in the first volume of the British Journal. An Experimental Study of Some Problems of Perceiving and Imaging (pp. 222-266): F. C. BARTLETT. — The present study is concerned solely with ways in which adult subjects set about perceiving material of greater or less complexity that is presented to their observation, and with the factors determining these ways. The writer concludes that under many different conditions, and in many different forms, the fundamental "effect after meaning" is found. "At first, always, there must be immediately present sense experience, and then we have an act of perceiving." Publications recently received. Proceedings of the British Psychological Society.
